

Be like a fart.

Justin Hutts

You say what? Be like a fart?

Remember in elementary school when everyone sat at their desks quietly working on their math and the kid in the corner of the classroom let out one of those silent but deadly ones? No sound was made, but one by one the stench reached each kid in the classroom, starting in the corner, working it's way to the utter most parts of the room. If you watched a diagram of student's reactions from up above you would notice the students react one by one, the closest first, then finally the farthest away.

This process in science is called dynamic equilibrium. Just open a jar of some stinky chemical; it will not take long for that stench to spread through the entire room. One by one you saw dynamic equilibrium take place. The molecules spread out until they could spread no more. They were spread completely and evenly throughout the room.

As leaders of the FUEL Student Ministries be like "dynamic equilibrium" by spreading like molecules. I should look across the room at any time and see a sea of kids with each youth leader spread throughout- not in bunches- but mixed throughout the students.

So be like a fart!¹

¹ This illustration is not original, but adapted from a youth pastor friend.